MAISON • MERGED DIRECTION

Antique Hearth merged with Richer Walnut

This merge keeps the warmth and domestic feel of Antique Hearth, but borrows the stronger structure and deeper grounding from Richer Walnut. It is less soft than Antique Hearth on its own and less formal than Richer Walnut on its own.

This is probably the real synthesis.

Antique Hearth had the better emotional warmth. Richer Walnut had the better brand discipline. Together they feel closer to a final Maison direction than either one alone.

WHAT STAYS

Antique, Natural Cotton, Terracotta, Gold Trimming, and Leather remain the core palette.

WHAT CHANGES

Leather leads more of the structure, Terracotta becomes more intentional, and the overall layout feels more controlled and premium.

MERGED STORY

Antique Walnut

This is Maison as a warm, editorial home brand with a stronger backbone. The cream and cotton keep it breathable, the terracotta keeps it human, the gold keeps it polished, and the leather gives it the authority Antique Hearth was hinting at but not fully pushing.

READ

This feels more final. It keeps the beautiful-home warmth, but it now has enough structure to support real product surfaces and a stronger future wordmark without getting muddy or overly rustic.

Your home feels steady, and the dashboard finally does too.

This keeps the warmth of the terracotta-gold direc but uses walnut structure so the app surface feels premium and less soft.

BRAND READ

Warmer than Richer Walnut, stronger than Antique Hearth.

This is the blend that feels most like a real Maison brand system instead of just a nice palette.

RECOMMENDATION

My take

WHAT IMPROVED

The warmth now feels less tentative, and the dashboard has more backbone. This is much closer to a final product identity than Antique Hearth alone.

WHAT TO WATCH

Leather should carry structure, not take over the whole surface. Gold should remain trim, and terracotta should be the emotional accent, not the background default.

RECOMMENDATION

This is the strongest combined direction so far. If you want one palette path to keep refining, I'd put this ahead of the separate Antique Hearth and Richer Walnut branches.
